

Finance

Let's face it, you love money. You think about it, plan for it, spend it, save it, and manage it. You are good with your money and would be good with other people's money. Have you considered a career in finance?

A finance professional must be skilled at assessing how individuals and organizations acquire, allocate, and use money—factoring in the risks and rewards of each specific enterprise. Whether you choose banking, securities, insurance, or a similar field, the finance program at the College of Business will enable you to launch your career in institutional finance.

For example, if you enjoy working with people and want to work on challenging assignments, you might be cut out to become a financial manager. Or you may enjoy working in international banking operations or consumer lending. You may work in the securities industry as a stock and bond broker, security analyst, or portfolio manager. Many finance professionals work for government agencies, handling their revenue and expenditure programs.

Advances in computer technology have made finance more rigorous and analytical than ever before. Today, in addition to developing skills in finance and accounting, you must be knowledgeable about statistical and quantitative methods, systems analysis, and computer applications. At the College of Business, you can acquire the precise training required to excel in these areas.

Participating in finance-specific experiential activities takes your learning outside the classroom and into the real world. The Finance Club hosts a variety of functions that give you opportunities to meet potential employers. The Investment Club invites you to become an investor in the equity markets. You'll come away with more job prospects and a better understanding of what it takes to excel as a finance professional.

Go forth and prosper.
